She brought it home a month ago. There was no way I could pretend I didn't know what it was.

She never brings things home. They belong out in the wild to be free, she says. But this one was injured. Badly. But now it has only a slight limp, and it stretches out its leathery wings, even though it doesn't fly.

She doesn't see the horrors that surround its legend. To the rest of the world, it is a harbinger of doom, an omen of death. To her, it is a friend. Someone to love unconditionally.

It's me.
