Hermione meandered around the compound, trying to ignore the cat calls of the many men that hadn't seen a woman in months. She really wished that she had taken Ginny up on the offer of learning her Bat-Bogey Hex. After seeing how much it made the boys at Hogwarts go mental, she would love to use it on these so-called hardened men. She had already witnessed Collins, one of the only men on the compound she could tolerate, lose it over a small wood spider. Watching her tormentors go mental over a simple hex was a welcome thought. Let the men try and pester her then.

"Hey, look over here, boys!" a particularly scruffy man called to a group of other keepers. "Wanna tame my 'dragon', little girl?" he called over to her. His small group of equally scruffy companions laughed tauntingly, apparently loving the look of irritation taking over her features.

Just as she lifted her wand to teach the men a lesson, she felt a large warm hand on her shoulder. "The only 'dragon' she will be taming will be mine," his voice boomed. She took note of how the other keepers jumped upon hearing the anger-filled voice.

Hermione looked up at her savior and rewarded him with a kiss that was as much of a show of gratitude as it was her way of showing the crude men which man held her affections. "So, Mr. Weasley. The night is still young. What do you say about taming that dragon?"

"They can be tricky creatures, Ms. Granger. May take more than one try," he replied in a mock serious voice.

"I think I'm fully up to the challenge."
