Chapter 1 of 1

Someone isn't very happy that Potter defeated the Dark Lord.

Disclaimer: Not mine. No money.

This was written for the Potter Place Saturday Night Drabbles Chat for Sunny33. Prompt information can be found at the end.

Megan Jones watched in dismay as Harry Potter stood over the body of the Dark Lord. She'd wanted the little prick to die; she'd rejoiced when the Dark Lord had told them of Potter's death. How had the asshole survived once again? She looked over and saw that Draco Malfoy and his parents were sitting together and watching everything in shock. His cool blue eyes met hers for a moment before he looked away. All the help she'd given Draco in the past couple of weeks had been for naught: they'd lost anyway. Would he talk? Turn her in to the Ministry for her secret plotting against Potter?

She then thought about her poor mother. Nobody had cared much about the fact that a woman had been severely burned by the dragon on which Potter and his friends had escaped from Gringotts. That woman was her mother, and even now, she was still in St. Mungo's, suffering and undergoing painful treatments to get her skin back to normal.

That was Potter's fault. And even though he'd won this battle today, Megan was confident that he'd lose the war—the war she was secretly waging against him. She'd make him pay.

This drabble is 200 words (according to MS Word anyway).

Sunny33's prompt was: Pick a Hufflepuff who went to the Dark side. He/she saw/experienced something which turned him/her dark. What was it?

I wanted to choose someone different, so I found this person at the HPL:

Jones, Megan Hufflepuff

Hufflepuff 1991 – 1998.

Megan's name appears in the draft of the class list of Harry's year that Jo displayed during the "Harry Potter and Me" TV interview (HPM). She is half-blood. Megan has never appeared in canon, but her name is listed here because she apparently existed in early plans for the books.
