Chapter 1 of 1

Gilderoy finds such love comes only once in a lifetime.

They had been together over thirty years, a perfect pair. He took her everywhere and she never wandered from his side. Everyone who saw them just knew they were made for each other and smiled at the way he stared at her wherever they were. No one really knew if she had a name, only that they never saw him without her nor her without him.

So it was, as he arose early that morning, his first thoughts were of her, and he immediately began to search her depths only to stare in horror. His face paled at the sight of what beheld him, for during the night, tragedy had befallen his precious love. There it was, tiny but deadly and it took all he had not to cry out at the sight. This could not be. She had to be treated immediately.

Gathering up his dearest darling, he made his way out of his abode and through the streets, not sure where to go for help until he saw the sign of one the best glaziers in the city. Throwing open the door, Gilderoy carried her in, wrapped in a blanket and cradled in his arms.

"Help me! You have to help me!" he exclaimed, panic clearly evident in his voice. "Save her, please! She is the only one who has ever understood me."

Carefully, the glazier unwrapped the mirror from the blanket and examined the peeling back. "No problem, sir. Just needs a bit of re-silvering."
