Goyle's substitute for a broken wand proves a healthier option.

The hour was late as the cloaked and masked figures gathered together at the old cemetery. They had been meeting regularly ever since word came out that the Dark Lord was nearing his return. Tonight, they were meeting to learn the latest news on their leader's situation.

"Everyone is here?" Lucius asked, looking around at the group and counting the number of figures before removing his mask and nodding at the others to do the same. Each one took their mask off to reveal their identity, thereby preventing any Ministry spies or, worse yet, Order of the Phoenix member that might be around. Lucius was about to speak again when the sound of a twig snapping was heard by all gathered. Instinctively, wands were drawn by all as they attempted to ensure no one was eavesdropping.

All was good as it was simply an animal passing through. Gathered in the circle once more, everyone looked at the others with all eyes eventually resting on one particular Death Eater and his wand, for lack of a better word for it.

Lucius blinked in disbelief as he asked, "What is that?"

The offending Death Eater looked down at what he had in his hand. "What? This? A banana," he responded.

"Why do you have a banana, Goyle?" asked the irritated Lucius.

"Well, my wand broke and I just grabbed this."

Lucius glared. "Let me rephrase the question," the now more irritated leader of the group spoke. "Why do you have a banana instead of your wand?"

"Well, bananas are good," Goyle began to explain, adding, "Especially at parties and it has potassium."

Based on a prompt from Rose of the West: Seriously, what if you took bananas to a Death Eater gathering.
