Once there was a clever and kind Gryffindor called Hermione, who returned to Hogwarts to be an Arithmancy teacher.

Professor Snape, who had of course survived the war, found himself unsure around this intelligent woman. Nevertheless, he spoke to her at meal times and sometimes recommended new books. Hermione would smile at him and everything seemed brighter.

One spring weekend, Snape gruffly asked if she wanted to collect potions ingredients together.

A Portkey took them to a meadow full of bright yellow flowers.

"What potion are they for?" Hermione enquired.

"None... the flowers remind me of you," Snape replied softly.
